Primate Rehabilitation:

In 2001, Monkey World Ape Rescue UK and Pinglung Wildlife Rescue Centre in Taoping, Vietnam, opened a primate conservation program in which they would work with the Vietnamese authorities to establish a primate rehabilitation center. The program was successful in establishing a primate rehabilitation center that is now known as the Dao Tien Endangered Primate Species Centre. The center is located in Cat Tien National Park in southern Vietnam, and it was opened in 2007.

The center is dedicated to the rehabilitation of primates that have been captured illegally, as well as those that have been rescued from the pet trade. The center is also involved in the protection of the local primate species, which are threatened with extinction due to habitat destruction and poaching.

The center has a team of experienced primatologists and conservationists who work together to provide the best possible care for the primates. The center is also involved in the development of conservation programs that aim to protect the local primate species and their habitats.

Primate Conservation:

Primates are highly intelligent and social animals that are important in maintaining the balance of ecosystems. They are also highly endangered due to habitat destruction, poaching, and the illegal pet trade.

The center is working to protect the local primate species by rehabilitating them and releasing them back into the wild. The center also works with local communities to raise awareness about the importance of primate conservation.

For more information and updates, please visit the center's website at www.go-east.org.